

Dani and the Machine Wars

"Dani, can you hear me? This is FIRE-bird 1. Over."

The awful sound of engine thrusters roared somewhere above where Dani was hiding and she quickly cut the radio link. She held her breath, praying that the machines hadn't heard Devlin's voice. The roar of the engines changed to a low hum. That wasn't a good sign. It meant that the machines were hovering – searching the wreckage for signs of life. If they had heard the radio message, it would all be over; they wouldn't stop until they had found her. And, once they'd found her... well, Dani didn't want to think about that. Either way, it was a crummy way to spend a birthday.

Brp, brp brp, brp...

The sound of a scanner-bot came echoing along the corridor. Dani squeezed her legs in tightly and peered through the grill of the air vent that she was hiding in. It was cramped and hot and not designed to hold humans. Then again, Dani wasn't entirely human now anyway. It was funny, really. She was becoming more like the machines every day.

Brp, brp, brp, brp... vvvvwwrrrrr...

The scanner-bot stopped right outside the air vent and began to slowly turn. Dani shivered. She could never get used to the way the bots looked. Small, maybe the size of a football from that game people played in the last century, scanner-bots were half-metallic, half-organic, with leathery-looking skin that hung loosely from their body. They were designed to scout out an area and were always the first droids to enter a battle scene. This one hovered about a metre from the ground; its three needle-like feelers scanned the air as it moved. Its sensors lit the corridor in a flickering sea of crimson and edged closer to where Dani was hiding. If it picked up her life signs, she was in trouble. Dani closed her eyes and accessed her X-Brain. It was a new app that her father had installed into her mind just before he'd left for the Machine Wars. With it, she could access her central nervous system which gave her power over pretty much all of her body's functions. Dani missed her father. It just wasn't the same without any of the adults.

In a matter of milliseconds, Dani had programmed her breathing and heart rate to fall below what the droid's scanners would consider 'alive'. She immediately slumped against the curved flooring of the vent. She felt sick and she couldn't move but she had no choice. It was as if a switch inside her body had been turned to 'off'.

Vrrrrrrrrrrrrr...

Red, chequered light shone into Dani's unblinking eyes as the scanner-bot identified her lifeless body. "Human female located," it stated, dryly. "Downloading files... accessing... Colonel Danielle Hutchens of First Infantry Rebellion Elite... highly sought after by Machine-Command..."

"Status," a different voice crackled over the droid's com-system.

"Deceased," the scanner-bot confirmed.

"Initiate retrieval process," the other voice commanded. Dani's eyes widened. 'Retrieval' was basically a machine way of saying 'bring it back, chop it up and feed it to our organic engines' – not exactly number one on Dani's birthday list this year, and not what she was expecting, either. She had assumed that the bot was going to continue scanning the battered space cruiser.

Time for Plan B, Dani thought to herself, as the droid began burning through the metal grill with a laser.

Using her X-Brain, Dani instantly brought her heart rate and breathing back to normal and sprang forward, kicking hard at the metal grill.

"Error," the scanner bot announced as it went crashing into the opposite wall. Before it had time to react, Dani jumped down and grabbed the droid, sending an electrical pulse into its mainframe with her robotic arm. "Err... orrrrrrr..." the machine babbled as it crashed lifelessly to the floor.

"Now would be a really good time to teleport me out of here!" Dani whispered as she flicked the radio back online.

"Ah, Hutchens, nice of you to call back. Having fun on your birthday, are we?" the voice on the radio replied.

"I mean it, Devlin!" Dani hissed, as the machines' engines roared into to life somewhere above her. "There's not much time!"

"With you in ten seconds," the voice said calmly.

"I don't think I have 10 seconds!" Dani screamed.

"10, 9, 8, 7, 6..."

The walls began to rattle and vibrate and the roar of the engines became almost unbearable. Whatever the machines were doing out there, it wasn't good.

"Quick!" Dani cried.

"5, 4, 3, 2, 1, 0."

Nothing happened. The teleport hadn't worked. Dani was still on board the doomed space cruiser.

A huge explosion thundered along the corridor and wave of heat crashed into her side. Dani stumbled backwards, closing her eyes as she fell to the floor.

Suddenly, the noise disappeared, and Dani felt cool again. She opened her eyes. She was lying on the familiar deck of FIRE-bird 1 with her crew around her.

"Sorry," Devlin smiled. "I went with eleven seconds in the end."

"What?" Dani spat, breathing hard and still lying on the floor.

"Eleven... you know, because you're eleven today? It seemed special," Devlin replied, like it was the obvious thing to have done. "Happy birthday, Colonel!"
